For the Sake of Your Local Church

Local United Methodist churches have plenty of challenges to contend with right now. In the midst of the Covid-19 pandemic many are finding ways to reopen sanctuaries so members can worship God together while still allowing for social distancing. Where possible, pastors and lay ministers are venturing back into nursing homes and assisted living facilities to physically visit and share holy communion with members who have been isolated for months. Other local churches have opened or re-opened food banks to help people in need. And still others are venturing beyond the walls of the church to work for justice, reconciliation, and peace in their communities. All of these are rightfully top priority concerns.
